BIMONTHLY NEWSLETTER

VOL II, ISSUE IX (SEP 26TH 2016)

In this issue of the Specker Library Newsletter, we cover recent and upcoming events that the library is involved in. In the first paragraph, we discuss the recent research workshop the library hosted. In the next section, we talk about the events the library has planned for Banned Books Week.

DID YOU KNOW?

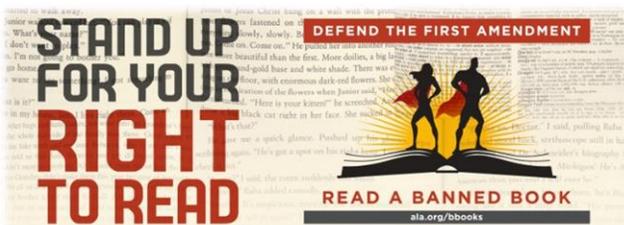

Students, faculty, and staff can access Specker Library's electronic databases on campus, as well as from home through the library's web page. Simply visit the library's website, click on "Databases," and select an option. If you are at home, you will be prompted to enter your student ID # and last name to access our resources. Enjoy your access to millions of articles, thousands of eBooks and more!

LIBRARY HOSTS RESEARCH WORKSHOP

Last week, the Specker Library, with support from the Tutoring Center, hosted a basic research workshop. The workshop focused on introducing students to the general research process, including the basics of developing a research topic and formulating keywords. Students also learned how to navigate the library's print and electronic resources. The library plans to offer additional workshops in the future.

CELEBRATING BANNED BOOKS WEEK

This week, libraries across the country will celebrate National Banned Books Week, a yearly event celebrating the freedom to read. By drawing attention to current and past efforts to remove or restrict access to books, the event seeks to promote the right of individuals to have access to all information, regardless of the views expressed in those works.

Specker Library will join other libraries in celebrating Banned Books Week by holding a series of events this week, starting with a trivia game in which students will guess the titles of books that have been banned. On Tuesday, the library will show the movie "Persepolis," a film based off the banned book. On Thursday, the library will host an event called "Smart Thursday," where students will be able to come and share their opinion on book banning.
